Scriptural Misquotations.

"He who runs may read" is a very Scriptural, but it is in reality a mangled version of the verse in the prophet Habakkuk, "Write the vision and make it plain upon the tablet; he may run that readeth it." Another Biblical quotation is "By the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." And when we pour "oil on the troubled waters" thousands search the Scriptures in vain for the metaphor.—London Chronicle.

Jewelry in the Laundry.

"Yes, these are genuine diamonds, all right," said the owner of a downtown laundry as he drew a pair of heavy links from a gentleman's shirt. "Often happen? Why, look here!" and he drew open a small box and displayed a dozen links and collar buttons. "These came in this week. Some are valuable, some are not, but a dishonest dealer could really make a small fortune in a year's time. We don't find much jewelry in women's apparel. They are not as forgetful as men in this respect."—New York Sun.

Balanced.

"Why is the delivery boy always in such a rush?" asked the lady in the grocery.

"So that if in his haste he delivers anything wrong he will have time to right the matter," the grocer explained.—Buffalo Express.

A LEGEND OF THE COLORADO

How Chief Rainbow Won Singing Water For His Bride

Out in that magnificent country through which flows the Colorado there was once an Indian chief of such imposing mien, such great strength, such marvelous bravery, that his own and neighboring tribes attributed to him superhuman powers. His son, Rainbow, inheriting much of his father's manly beauty and courage, and when the father became too old to lead in war he summoned his people and representatives of the neighboring tribes to witness the ceremony of his abdication in favor of the younger man. When all were assembled Sunface, the father, addressed his son, admonishing him to rule wisely, then counseled the visiting chiefs to keep the peace, ending by placing in the young man's hand a bow which the old chief had carried for many years. One of the chiefs present had brought his daughter, Singing Water, to witness the ceremony. Rainbow saw her and loved her. Singing Water saw the young chief and loved him. Before the maiden returned with her father to her country Rainbow had asked for her hand, but she had been promised to another, Snake-In-His-Hole.

Singing Water had no sooner departed than Rainbow fell into melancholy. His father, seeing that Rainbow would be useless as a ruler without the maiden, proposed that they should go together to her father and endeavor to secure her in marriage. They made the journey, crossing the Colorado, and appeared before the chief. He did not dare grant their request for fear of antagonizing Snake-In-His-Hole. Having met with a "life refusal," they started, with heavy hearts, on their return journey. On the way they saw Singing Water sitting on a rock waiting to bid adieu to the man she loved. Rainbow rode up to the rock, which was to the height of his pony's back. Singing Water put her arms about him and whispered in his ear, "Take me with you." Placing her before him on the horse, he gave the word he used only when he wished the beast to go at full speed, and before the few people standing about had realized what he was doing Rainbow, with his burden, was going like the wind. Sunface followed, calling on his son to halt.

Snake-In-His-Hole, seeing that something was amiss, rode to where the maiden had been captured and, learning what had taken place, dashed after the fugitives, calling at the same time to other warriors to follow him. Sunface when he overtook his son chided him for what he had done.

It seemed to the lovers that the old man spoke harshly, for the Colorado lay between them and safety, and its crossing was a slow process. Before they could descend a thousand feet to their boat their pursuers would be upon them, and when they climbed the opposite cliff they would be within easy reach of arrows.

When they arrived at the river, Sunface, but his son return to him the spear which he had surrendered and began the descent to the river with the maiden. The young man gave up the spear and led Singing Water down the trail. When the pursuers came up they found the old chief sitting on his horse in the bed of a shallow stream, drowsing between two rocks which he could touch with either hand and towering far above him.

The Indians had so long been used to considering Sunface as superhuman that the awe inspiring sight of the old man sitting on his horse, rigid, his spear poised, his eyes fixed upon their leader, brought them to a sudden halt. Snake-In-His-Hole himself, though brave and angered at the abduction of the maiden, recoiled.

"Stand aside, old man!" he cried. "We respect you for your past deeds and your age and would not harm you."

Sunface answered never a word, sitting fixedly, staring before him without moving his eyes from the speaker.

"He is the god of the past!" cried one. "No man can go between the rocks while he is there. He can call the lightning from heaven to aid him."

"He is mortal," said Snake-In-His-Hole, and he hurled his spear at Sunface, but superstition diverted his aim, and the weapon rebounded from the rock at the right. Seizing another spear, Snake-In-His-Hole hurled it again, only to strike the rock on the left. Then the warriors drew off and watched the man they took for a god from a distance. Evening came, and still he moved not.

When midnight came they said that no mortal could hold a spear poised so long, surely not an old man. When the pale face of the moon looked at them from the west, growing more and more ashen before the break of day, and the old chief still sat with his arm raised, one by one the people before him fell on their faces. When the sun chased away the shadows and the great figure stood out more clearly Snake-In-His-Hole was subdued and he leaped forward, drawing near, he leaped forward and peered into the white face. He saw that Sunface was dead.

Rainbow took the maiden across the river, then went back to his father. While recrossing the river he met the Indians in a boat bearing the body of his father, whom they persisted in considering a god.

The two tribes were afterward united under Rainbow.

Lincoln's Fees.

As a rule, Abraham Lincoln's fees were less than those of other lawyers of his circuit. Justice Davis once remonstrated with him and insisted that he was doing a grave injustice to his associates at the bar by charging so little for his services. From 1850 to 1859 his income varied from $2,000 to $3,000, and even when he was recognized as one of the ablest lawyers of the state his fee book frequently shows charges of $3, $5 and $1 for advice, although he never went into court for less than $10. During that period he was at the height of his power and popularity, and lawyers of less standing and talent charged several times those amounts.—"The True Abraham Lincoln."

YOU buy them for protection and a good lock is the cheapest protection in the world.

A good lock will last nearly a life time. Isn't the difference afforded in safety over the cheap lock worth many times the small difference in price? What a different feeling you have, especially when you are away and your family is at home, with a lock on your door that only your key will open or that any tramp can force in a few minutes.

TILL one of our locks is readily opened with the proper key without any groping, fumbling, or aggravating twisting and turning. A house with good things inside and cheap locks is like a lot of money in a pocket with a hole in it. We have pad locks too, which protect your other buildings in the same way.
